Part II. English Reading Section

A honey bee returns to the hive. Sticky pollen clings to her body. Nectar fills her honey sac. She's found apple blossoms in a distant orchard. How does she tell other worker bees about this new food source? She dances!

Unlike humans, animals don't have words to help them communicate. They can't say "Hey! Look what I found," or "Keep away! This is my spot," or "Want to go steady?" Yet, animals communicate all the time. They send out signals – messages others receive and understand using their senses of smell, taste, touch, hearing, and sight.

Animals with good vision "talk" to each other with their bodies. They use patterns of movements to share information, to ① defend themselves or their territories, and to ② attract mates. Nature designs their steps, and they dance as if their lives depended on it. Often, ③ they do.

Most communication takes place among members of the same species. In dark beehives, honeycombed walls become waxy dance floors. Like a rock star swarmed by adoring fans, a bee returning from the apple orchard begins her dance. Other workers follow her as she moves forward in a straight line. She vibrates her wings and wags her body side to side very quickly – 13 to 15 times a ④ second. Then she turns to one side, circles back, and begins the waggle again. When she finishes, she circles around – this time in the opposite direction – and repeats her steps. The dance may go on for hours.
